Excerpt: . . . position regarding the railroads was more Democratic than Republican. As a political issue, the regulation of the railroad rates through governmental supervision will undoubtedly be a popular one. Senator Burkett, of Nebraska, did not exaggerate the sentiment in the West when he asserted that in his State the railroad problem overshadowed every other issue. In a country so thoroughly dependent upon transportation as the United States, every question relating to the railroads touches an innumerable throng of people in all classes of society. The tariff, with its multitudinous schedules, is the only subject comparable with it. Not only the manufacturing centm of the East, but the great agricultural regions of the West as well, are vitally affected. The farmers, said Secretary Wilson, upon his retur n from a Western trip, have never been so interested in anything as they are in the railroad rate question. They are not particularly against the railroads, he added, but they are anxious to get a square deal and prevent further discrimination. The great mass of the people who must, wittingly or unwittingly, pay tribute to the railroads are, therefore, with the President. They want federal interference and supervision to the extent of freeing them from real or fancied imposition, and they believe that the President is the Moses who will deliver them from their bondage. As with all great questions, however, there is a divergence of views as to the wisdom of federal legislation concerning railroads, and this...
