Excerpt: .judging from the half-smile that parted her lips, they were of a pleasant nature. He rose to his feet and stretched his limbs. Glancing at the time, he found that it was only half-past one. There were still four hours to dawn. A stir in the sitting-room startled him; he had forgotten jaganath. The latter stood in the doorway, gazing at him with inquiry, not daring to speak for fear of awakening the sleeper. With a glance at his wife Rama Rajah joined his cousin, and they moved away. She sleeps, said the tired husband. It is well. Now my brother may venture to take his rest. I am here, and I will watch, waking you without fail if she moves. Rama Rajah stood for a few seconds in doubt. Iaganath repeated his suggestion, adding that there was no further need for such a...
