The great bulk of the poultry stored is sold in from nine to twelve months after storage; that is, before the next producing season. Ordinary grades of fowl are probably on the market between the sixth and ninth month of storage. Special seasonal products, such ns the small broiler or the softmeated roaster will probably be kept until these birds can be produced again, which means a twelve months time or close to it. It is the object of every egg storer to unload his storage holdings Just as promptly as possible when the egg shortage begins. If he can get his stock off in eight months he is pretty sure to do it. A nine months holding is apt...
