Hypodermic injection is, in man, the best method of administration. A sterile injection of 40 c.c. of normal saline, containing dissolved in it 40 c.g. of nucleinate of sodium, made in one or two convenient places, the flanks or the outer surface of the thighs, causes in a few hours some local pain, which can be allayed by the application of opium fomentations. After twenty-four hours, a slight amount of swelling and redness appears, but has disappeared by the following day. Two or three days later, a second injection is given, and a third, later on, the dose being diminished in each instance. There is, in this way, kept up a hyperleucocytosis favourable to the fight undertaken. Nucleinate of sodium appears to act by a quick and somewhat lasting increase in the function of phagocytosis. Its mode of action is powerful,...
